To have constructed the finest river-front in the world -an embankment beside which the Quais of Paris, and even those of St. Petersburg. are insignificant—that was one of the two great distinctions of Sir Joseph Bazdgette, whose death we announce with regret. His other feat. the completion of a comprehensive system of drainings for London, was less in sight, and therefore less talked about; but it was an engineering achievement of extraordinary magnitude, and has proved, on the whole, fairly successful. It is as the builder of the Embankment that Sir osenh Bazalgette will be best remembered; and had his efforts been mided as they ought to have been, that line of quays-would-be as splendid architecturally as it is from the engineering point of view. . The gold-coloured allotropic silver described by M. C. Lea, of Philadelphia, about two years ago has been subjected by him to further study. It is found that allotropic silver—which may be produced in a great variety of colours such as gold-colour, copper-colour, blue, bluish-green, red and purple—may be presented in a form intermediate between that already made known and ordinary silver, and differing in a marked-way from both. All forms of energy act upon allotropic silver, converting it into ordinary Bilver or into the intermediate form. Mechanical force - ven alight Friotion-and high tension electricity convert it directly into ordinary silver. Heat and chemical action convert it first into the intermediate form; then into ordinary silver. The action of light is to produce the intermediate form only, and prolonged action at ordinary temperatures does not carry it beyond this Conversion to ordinary silver occurs spontane. ously in the course of time, even in the dark A connection is evident between these varied and wonderful transformations of pure silver. and the changes which many silver salts undergo through the achon of light.
